What is the basis for the antiestrogenic effect of TCDD on the male reproductive system? A work in progress. In male rats, TCDD (0.1 microgram/kg) led to a diminished testicular incorporation of [3H]methylthymidine into DNA and a reduced testis weight in relation to body weight. No decrease in serum testosterone levels were observed. In contrast, serum LH levels were increased by TCDD administration. These data suggest that TCDD diminished spermatogenesis by blocking testosterone levels and not by affecting Sertoli cell functions. The testosterone protective mechanism seems to involve a feedback on the hypothalamic GnRH, which in turn is associated with an increased synthesis and secretion of LH (Brunner et al., Endocrinology 80:32-39, 1962; Brunner et al., Endocrinology 91:911-916, 1972).
